

This Flyer Has Too Many Words

Let's start by reminding you of something you already know. You don't have a lot of time for anything else. It will take you ninety seconds or so to read these few paragraphs, and then you need to get back to work, back to your family, back to your errands, or maybe back to some distraction that helps keep you (relatively) sane.

One thing you barely have time for is politics and government. If there's anything we all seem to agree on, it's that the politicians are making a mess of things. That our government is barely holding it together. That largely speaking, we don't trust our leaders and when we do think about them, we roll our eyes or shake our heads in disgust.

And we don't have time anyway. We could try to scan the newspapers, subscribe to the updates, read all the books, but the end result is still going to be a vote for someone slightly less worse than someone else.

Because these people don't represent us. They represent someone else: the people and businesses who give them millions of dollars. It's no wonder we can't trust them: they aren't working for we the people. They are accountable to whoever is writing the checks.

What we need, I believe, is someone who isn't like that. A regular person who isn't rich and who isn't trying to become rich by asking for money. A person who wants the only thing that really matters and that can really make a difference. That's what I am: a person who is seeking your trust.

My name is Robby Slaughter and I am running for Congress here in Indiana. I am not a part of any political party. I am not accepting donations nor am I spending my own money on the campaign. I am not focused on left-right issues: I am focused on trust.

Because I believe that if you can trust someone, you can support them even if you disagree with them.

And I trust you. I trust that you want something other than whatever it is that we always get. So look me up. Ask around about me. See if I'm someone you think you can trust.

It's probably the hardest thing a stranger will ever ask of you. But I believe, now more than ever, trusting a regular guy running for Congress as an Independent is just about the only thing left for us to try.

Thanks for reading.
